The Editor of the American Farmer (Md.) in July '67, in a very interesting

But few cultivators, comparatively, recognize the value of a due preparation of seeds by steeping in fertilizing substances. There seems to be on record hardly enough of reliable testimony to justify a dependence upon any particular mode or of any particular substance, in thus fertilizing our seeds, but quite enough to call for and to justify the most painstaking experiments to determine how or with what the different seeds may be prepared to give them that impulse in their earliest growth which seems to influence all their after progress. We know how especially necessary to our great staple, wheat, is such an early impulse, that, under our practice of late fall sowing, it may be so rooted in the fall as to enable it in the spring to bear its burden of seed. It may be doubted whether the marvellous effect of a mere dusting of Peruvian guano were not due rather to this effect upon its carliest growth than to any other influence. When the drill came into use, intelligent farmers testified that fifty pounds put in contact with the seed, through the tubes of the drill, were equivalent to two hundred sown broadcust; and less than half this quantity was said to give an equal apparent improvement in some cases, where the grain was brined first and dusted with as much guano as would adhere to

Dr. David Stewart, well known as an agricultural chemist, and who has given a great deal of experimental investigato questions of the sort, says, in an article published some years ago in the American Farmer : "Any soil properly constituted with regard to consistence and in organic elements, will produce double the crop with good cultivation if we ensure a prompt and vigorous growth of the young plant."

"The most important influence," he says, further, "exerted by concentrated manure, appears to be their tendency to develop more promptly and perfectly the germs of the cereals. How it is possible that the embryo should anticipate its future wants, and recognize the supply, we cannot divine; but it appears pretty weil established that seeds may be dormant for years, until a certain excess of the elements necessary to their full development accumulates around them, and thus, or by peculiar cultivation, they obtain the ascendency over other plants.

"Multiplied experiments have proved that a tithe of this quantity, placed near the seed, will produce the same effeet, although two-thirds of the manure are composed of volatile elements which do not contain one fifth of their weight of nitrogen; and what is still more remarkable, the nitrogenous or ammoniacal manures, not only and more than ten times their weight of nitrogen to the plants, but those grains that contain the most nitrogen are least benefit ted by nitrogenous manures. Have we derived no hints on this subject from the poor Indian, who to this day presses out a few drops of blood from his slaughtered foe upon his bills of maize? Blood is a highly azotized substance, exceedingly liable to change, and during the state of activity or change it is up! to set up fermentation in grains of corn. and those metamorphoses which preceds and accompany germination.'

A number of carefully made experiments are also found recorded in the American Farmer, as made by Hon. T. G. Glemson, Commissioner of Agriculture under President Buchanan, on his farm near Washington.

"The practice of preparing seed," he remarks, " is by no means new. The Egyptians and other nations practiced the it made a necessa y part of their system of husbandry. After multiplied observations and varied experiments, I have come to the conclusion that a proper Tobacco, Flour, Wheat, Gorn, Rye, and all other Produce, and make prompt returns preparation vastly increases production. I also believe that the same cause renders the plant less liable to the casualties of disease and the destructive action of insects, and in small grain, on which I have chiefly experimented, increases the quantity and quality of the grain, as well as adding greatly to the size, healthiness, and amount of straw

"These observations have been repeatedly corroborated by those who have had occasion and have taken sufficient interest in the matter, to compare and examine into the subject.

"As the experiments were instituted for my own personal satisfaction, I have not found it necessary to be exact as to Late of Amierson, measurement of ground and product; varied plantings, side by side, afforded the means of compaison for my purpo ses. At the instance of a friend, I carefully measured the ground planted last year in rye and wheat. No manore of any kind was used.

"The ground seeded amounted to nine and a half acres-seven and a half in rye and two in wheat. The top o the hill which I thought the pooresi, was sowed with rye, the seed having been previous y prepared; through the entire length and in the centre a strip of about two lands was sowed with the same seed in its normal state. The ground sowed with the prepared seed in asured three acres. There was a manifest difference in the heads, straw, and grain, between the prepared and unprepared. The crop from the prepared seed was even, tall and heavy; the heads long and bend ng over. That from the unprepared was unevenmuch of it small and not worth cut-

"The three acres from the prepared seed yielded thirty-six bushels. The six and a half acres from unprepared seed yielded rye thirty three, and wheat nine bushels-forty-two bushels."

There seems to be no reason at all to doubt the accuracy and care and intelligence which attended these experiments or the remarkable results. What we should learn from them, and from all that has been said upon the subject, from the antiquity of the practice of preparing seed, and the confidence with which it is spoken of as an old usage, and by those whom attention has been more recently directed to it, is that it is a matter well worthy of scientific investigation, and the most careful and varied experiment. And in our practice, in the meantime, no one for want of Petersburg. - - - - Va. article on the preparation of seed wheat faith should fail to give his seeds of every description such fertilizing treatment as is here suggested. A soaking of twelve or eighteen hours in the drain ings of the manure heap, or soaking in strong brine and drying in powdered Peruvian guano, or some similar treatment, may be tried without loss, even if it fail entirely of anything but the labor. In these times of necessary economy, it will be very satisfactory to find that we can indeed cause great increase of a crop at the very small cost indica-
